Parents, teachers, counselors and anyone who is involved in a child's life all have a very important role in the healthy development of a child's self-esteem. How they see the child and how they respond to him or her has an impact on how the child values him or herself, and how they learn to respond to others and the world around them.

Learning Goals & Content

- This three-day program will explore what contributes to the healthy emotional development and sense of well-being of a child;
- Participants will learn attitudes, approaches and techniques for responding to children's behaviours and reactive emotions in effective, loving, and supportive ways;
- We will be looking at ways to nurture a supportive atmosphere in which children can thrive;
- This program will be experiential; participants can expect to learn and practice some specific ways of working with children while also looking at their own patterns of reacting and responding to different behaviours and emotions.

Objectives

In the program, the participants will learn to work with children by:

- Knowing and experiencing their inner selves;
- Discovering their strengths and resources;
- Exploring relationship patterns and opening up to new possibilities;
- Discovering new ways to nurture and develop healthy self-esteem in children;
- Experiencing and applying specific Satir Model interventions when working with children.

Format

- Lectures, small group discussions, structured exercises, demonstrations, experiential learning and skill practice sessions

Certificate

- Certificate of Attendance for those who have at least 80% attendance
